Murray went into the back room, where he chatted with several acquaintances. He told them he had been out in a cab all night and was ashamed to go home and face his wife, as he had spent all his salary. "I'm fired of being a fireman, anyway," he said, "and this will be my last day in the department." The men did not know what he meant, but when he left the room he sent Patino Mulco, the Italian porter, across the street to Eberhard's drug store for three ounces of carbolic acid.
